Uncertainties in the measurement of occupational lung disease risk factors in construction--a methodologic appraisal. International recommendations support the use of the job-exposure matrix (JEM) to assess occupational exposure, but its reliability is uncertain. The goal of this study was to use a regression calibration method to assess the accuracy of exposure estimates from job title-specific JEMs in construction, and to evaluate the influence of several sources of uncertainty on exposure estimates, including measurement error and lack of precision in the dose-response slopes. As a second objective, we evaluated the validity of the JEMs according to their ability to rank exposure levels. Data were collected in an industrial hygienist's office in Canada and the United States between 1997 and 1999. Among the 29 workers who were cross-validated by personal and air sampling, concordance of the average exposures (aggregated to the job level) was found in 67% of cases. The observed concordance (as opposed to the expected 80%) was evaluated by two different analyses, and it was higher for low-exposure workers (64%) than for high-exposure workers (49%), suggesting that the JEMs tend to overestimate the lung burden among workers with high exposures. The list-wise concordance was 60%. For high-exposure workers, a more detailed comparison of exposures based on personal sampling was found to be very sensitive to the choice of the response model for the exposure estimates. The logistic regressions performed to correct for the measurement error revealed higher concordance and lower misclassification rates for the job-specific JEMs
