Category:Design Category:Computer-aided designQ: Did Einstein's vision go blurry during the war? There is a famous quote in the Milner Institute biography of Einstein that says: He entered into the war with a . . . "war-time" haziness of vision, beginning to lose even the sight he had developed in his youth. But most of the accounts of Einstein's service in the war seem to omit any reference to his vision getting worse. Only this biography explicitly mentions it. Is this true? A: I think it's a common misconception. I could not find anything specifically about Einstein. The information in this answer is taken from the Einstein biographies and from the documentary on Einstein. There is no mention of the haziness in Einstein's scientific papers. The papers say that Einstein was a professor during the war, and he lived in Zurich, Switzerland. Even when he was a minor official (not really sure what this means), there is no mention of the haziness, but I don't want to insinuate what Einstein knew before he became a major official. The fact that Einstein's life is so well documented, his papers are published, his first wife's scientific papers are well documented,
