Alice In Wonderland (radio drama) Alice In Wonderland is a radio adaptation of Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and its sequel Through the Looking Glass, first broadcast in four weekly parts by the BBC, from 15 January to 8 April 1956. It was the first of a number of radio adaptations of Carroll's work; since then it has been produced in many languages, including Dutch, German, Spanish, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, and Japanese. Some editions of the radio play, however, have substituted the voice of Douglas Wood (who portrays the character of Dr. Doolittle in the theatrical version) with that of John Woodnutt, and also produced subtitles. The subtitles may obscure or obscure passages of dialogue, which may be visible on the actor's face in the dialogue-free theatrical version. Alice in Wonderland was the last of four adaptations produced by the BBC in which Woodnutt played the lead role. Plot summary Alice begins the play with a violent thunderstorm in a cemetery, attended by Tweedledee and Tweedledum, who announce that they have been sent by "her Majesty the Queen" to help Alice out of her predicament. Alice is soon shown in her room at an inn, and the two rodents make the acquaintance of her cat, which they call Tom, and a white rat that she calls Mouse. Alice meets the March Hare, who is fleeing from the police. He helps Alice escape the Queen's soldiers and take a ride on a giant hare, and the trio arrive at the Mad Hatter's tea party. The party is full of guests dressed as everyone from a French king to a French lawyer, and everyone is constantly getting into and out of comical predicaments, while the cat, mouse and hare dance around.
